It has collapsed with the fall of the Berlin Wall. In order to avoid a lapse of contemporary life into market-based indifference, Koslowski pleads in favour of a religious and ethical renewal of society. For the red sports car is full of mythical connotations and can be exchanged for social prestige, speed addiction, Eros and Thanatos.

Modern art, he says, is emblematic of a sublime sensibility, that is, a sensible. So-called immediate perception therefore lacks the certainty of immediacy itself, a certainty that must be deferred to the working out of a complete system of experience. However, the dissolution of narrative leaves the field of legitimation to a new unifying criterion: the performativity of the knowledge-producing system whose form of capital is information. Where the expert knows what he knows and what he doesn't know, the philosopher knows neither, but poses

Postmodern sensibility does not lament the loss of narrative coherence any more. In his view of this antagonism between culture and the market, Etzioni tends to emphasize two factors: the intensification of social planning and the reinforcement of collective consciousness which he would like to be accompanied by more competition.
