We followed what seemed to us the only reasonable course of action, in picking out spots that seemed to be machine gun emplacements or likely positions, ascertaining as best we could that our own troops were clear, and then firing at the spots selected. In that harbor the French battleship Jean Bart lay, on an even keel but badly wrecked by the main battery of the battleship Massachusetts BB 59 the previous November while landing the Army in North Africa. The men in the boat were suffering. Our target was the steel mill at Kamaishi. Nevada moored alone at F8 at the northeast end of the row, had been under partial steam and she, along with five destroyers, was able to get underway. As it progressed, the design also became heavily influenced by the wartime experience of the Royal Navy's armored carriers: This time, as events would soon prove, this sighting and sinking was anything but .

Historical Scenario. This article helps me see a bit more of that was involved their right and left, Company C and some 2d Battalion elements were crowded against the embankment on a front of a few hundred yards, the main Ranger force [5th Ranger Battalion] was about to come into the same area, and enemy fire from the bluffs just ahead was masked by smoke and ineffective. KMS Bismarck.
