Hiraga, Masako; Posadas, Josefina. The Sunken Billions Revisited. Whilst this is true today, it has not always been the case. From comparison of mortality rates in infant boys and girls, it becomes clear that boys are at higher risk of complications in the first few days of life: preterm births, asphyxia, birth defects and heart anomalies. Thus, the set of specific, quantified targets for reducing poverty, and achieving progress in health, education, and the use of environmental resources has been compiled within the framework of Millennium Development Goals, as adopted by the United Nations. Over nine years, the Scandinavian countries have been leading the pack with Iceland having closed the overall gap by

The topics covered in the Database include: population, fertility, families as with the sex ratio at birth, we see the highest ratios in several Asian countries where the share of boys is higher than we would expect. This ratio is not stable but instead shaped by biological, social, technological, cultural, and economic forces.
